

Lauren Rosenstein has been passionate about advocating for human rights and individuals right to self-determination in the Syracuse community for the past 15 years.

Professionally, she works as a Licensed Masters Social Worker (LMSW) and has experience working in many different settings in Syracuse.

From a young age, she understood everyone has a story; being able to learn about people, their cultures, and their personal journeys, is one of her greatest joys. Creating space for such interactions is one of Lauren's core values. She has seen firsthand both the challenges that members of our community have faced and overcome, as well as the opportunities people have created.

Lauren is excited to serve as a commissioner and more formally take on a role in our community, serving to promote diversity, facilitate and address intergroup dynamics, reduce discrimination, and leverage education and human connection. She is also excited to help connect and educate individuals in our community on different services. Additionally, she would like to help make sure their voices and needs are heard.
